Like many Greek islands, Tilos has lost most of its population in the past. Up in the hills, away from the beaches and bays, lies the empty village of Mikro Chorio. It was abandoned in the decades after the Second World War. Today, goats walk through the deserted houses. The village inhabitants left after the Second World War, seeking new lives in Athens, the United States and Australia.

But recently, Tilos has welcomed a dozen refugee families. The presence of the refugees has brought money to the island. They receive a small allowance from the UNHCR and spend the money in local shops. Now there are plans to build a cheese factory on Tilos, to take advantage of the milk produced by the 15,000 goats that wander its mountains and valleys.

"Some shepherds use the milk and one or two make their own cheese but it's for their families. It could work," said Stathis Kontos, special adviser to the mayor. It is hoped that the cheese factory will provide jobs for both Syrians and locals.

"The locals know how and the refugees can follow," said Mr. Kontos. This project may help Tilos' economy which depends a lot on tourism.

Some of the refugees hope to join relatives already settled in Germany or other EU countries, but the mayor hopes the rest will remain and rebuild their shattered lives on Tilos.
